Fort-Pattendorf The Fort-Pattendorf was a fortification of the Imperial city of Berlin. Location and History The fortifications of Berlin were built by Wilhelm II as soon as he assumed the German throne. The first work on the fortifications was led by architect Justus Thoma. The works on the fortification of the borough Stralau and the western fortifications began in 1881 and were finished in 1893. The fortifications were mostly built of sandstone and began with two solid walls. From the southern side there was a roof to give protection from artillery fire. It was made of yellow limestone and glazed at the lower edge. Above the roof there were two anti-aircraft guns. On the first floor there were living areas for the troops. The construction of the fortifications were finished by Justus Thoma with a total number of more than 100 buildings. The fortification The fortifications were mostly positioned on the east bank of the Spree river and on the Liebkessstrasse. The fortifications were a modern structure and were made from yellow limestone. Only on the corners in the southern part there were limestone foundations with 15 to 40 cm of thickness. They were used by the more modern forts for the foundation of the guns. One entrance gate on the eastern bank of the Spree could be built in the fortifications of the south. On the west side of the fortifications there were anti-aircraft guns. 82157476af
